

(H)aye-(H)aye,

Today we learned about the different jobs in zoos and aquariums (I know a lot of you felt left out last week). If you missed the meeting but are interested in the different job opportunities check out the attached slide show below.

The animal of the week was the Shrike (family Laniidae) which is a bird that gets its lovely name from the even lovely shriek-like sound it makes. These birds participate in cooperative breeding where younger birds help their parents raise offspring. From that info you might think they are a cute wholesome bird but think again. These are the bird equivalent of a deranged serial killer by the creepy way they impale their prey on needles and branches. The E-Board gives the shrike a 5/10, while they are not very dangerous to humans as we are a bit larger than their prey size of choice they are still creepy so we would prefer to stay away from their butchering habits.

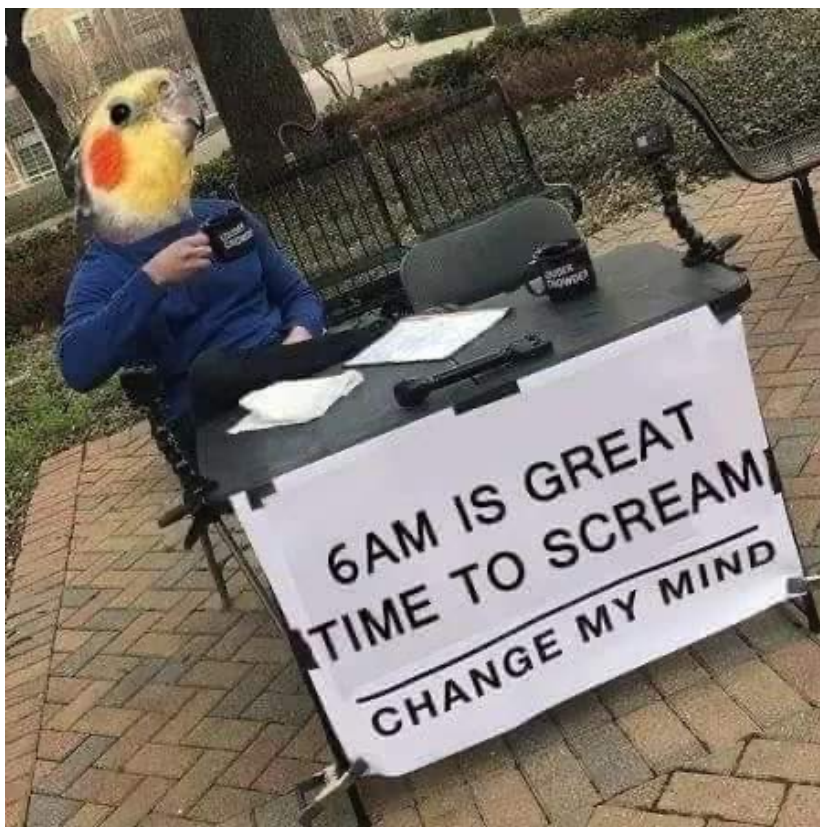

Merch update! We are experiencing some printing difficulties and the shirts may take a bit longer than expected to get in. We will continue to update you guys as we have more information from custom ink.

Are you interested in taking on a more active role in ZSA? Do you want more leadership opportunities? Well you are in luck as most of our E-Board is graduating soon so positions will be open! More information on available positions, how to run for an e-board spot, and job shadowing will come in the following weeks.

Memes of the week:

A symbol of wealth amongst the pigeon community

SHEER FORCE OF

ANGER ALONE

i love shrikes because they're horrible little carnivores whose feeding habits are grim enough to earn them the nickname 'butcherbird' but they look like this

Stay fishy fresh,

Your ZSA E-Board

Zoom Meeting ID: 990 0125 1588

Meeting room 140 Natural Science

 What Do Zookeepers Do?